The Randon Jottings of Donald Jay from Nelson in Pendle

Folklore of the Ward Stone and Bowland Forest.

The Ward Stone is not just any ordinary hill, but a place where the veil between the physical world and the spiritual realm is thin. The locals believe that the Ward Stone is a sacred place where they can communicate with their ancestors and seek guidance from the spirits.

One night, a group of travelers had lost their way in the forest and stumbled upon the Ward Stone. As they approached the hill, they noticed a strange glow emanating from the top. Intrigued, they decided to climb to the summit to investigate.

As they reached the top, they were met with a mystical sight. The boulder that gave the hill its name was glowing with an otherworldly light, and a voice echoed through the air, beckoning them closer. The travelers were hesitant at first, but the voice continued to call to them, promising to reveal secrets of the universe.

The travelers slowly approached the Ward Stone, and as they drew closer, they were enveloped in a warm, welcoming energy. The boulder began to pulsate, and suddenly, a portal opened up before them. It was a gateway to a realm beyond their wildest imagination.

Without hesitation, they stepped through the portal, and suddenly they found themselves transported to a world beyond their wildest imagination. The air was filled with a magical aura, and strange creatures roamed the land. The travelers were in awe, and they knew they had stumbled upon something truly incredible.

As they explored this strange new land, they came across an old wise man who had been waiting for them. He greeted them warmly and explained that the Ward Stone was a portal to the spirit realm. He told them that they were not just travelers, but chosen ones who had been summoned to this mystical land for a purpose.

The wise man revealed to them that they had been chosen to bring peace to the world and restore balance to the forces of nature. He told them that they would be given the power to communicate with the spirits and harness their energy to achieve great things.

The travelers were overcome with emotion and gratitude, and they vowed to use their newfound powers for the greater good. And so, they returned to the physical realm, armed with the knowledge and wisdom of the spirit realm.

From that day on, the travelers became known as the Ward Stone guardians, protectors of the mystical portal and keepers of the ancient knowledge that lay hidden within. And whenever the world needed them, they would return to the Ward Stone to seek guidance and renew their bond with the spirit realm.
